It is in two reels directed, with the knowledge that 1,000 feet each, and tells a story there is nothing else in the world. that is at once forceful and entertain-ing, while each and every scene was notographed amid the picturesque acties of old Italy.

There is a powerful scene show ing the daughter of the spy, who is in love with her father's prisoner, located in the tower of the grim old fortress. She is a very clever woman, and brings her wits into play by planning to free her lover, who is condemned to be executed the following morning. To accomplish this, she pries up the tiles on the roof of the fortress and digs a hole down through the cell ing of the room where the condemned man is. Once in, she makes it an case matter to get to him the necessary ropes, and the most thrilling in-cident of the play occurs thereby. This brave little woman lowers herself upon a sope from the roof-top to the ground —a distance of some 100 feet or more.
The happy pair have scarcely reached the ground when they are overtaken, and in the melec the girl is shot, when the spy discovers his daughter's true lover is his own prisoner.
